

CEOs on climate change

Compiled by B.K. SIDHU
bksidhu@thestar.com.my

THE concerns about the planet's future have heightened significantly over the past eight months.

There is a serious disconnect between ambition and action.

Even though efforts are far from enough along in this journey, substantive change can only come with bold, collective action for the needle to move.

About two-thirds of executives say their companies are very concerned about climate change and 79% see the world at tipping point, a number that was at 59% in a similar Deloitte's survey done in early 2021.

A total of 97% of companies have already felt the negative effects of climate change and 88% agreed that with immediate action, the worst impacts of climate change can be limited. That figure was 63% eight months ago, according to Deloitte's latest survey which polled more than 2,000 C-suite executives across 21 countries.

Some organisations are struggling to embed climate considerations into their cultures and strategies and obtain the broad senior leader buy-in to effect meaningful transformation, according to Deloitte.

Despite that, two-thirds of organisations are already using more sustainable materials and increasing the efficiency of energy use.

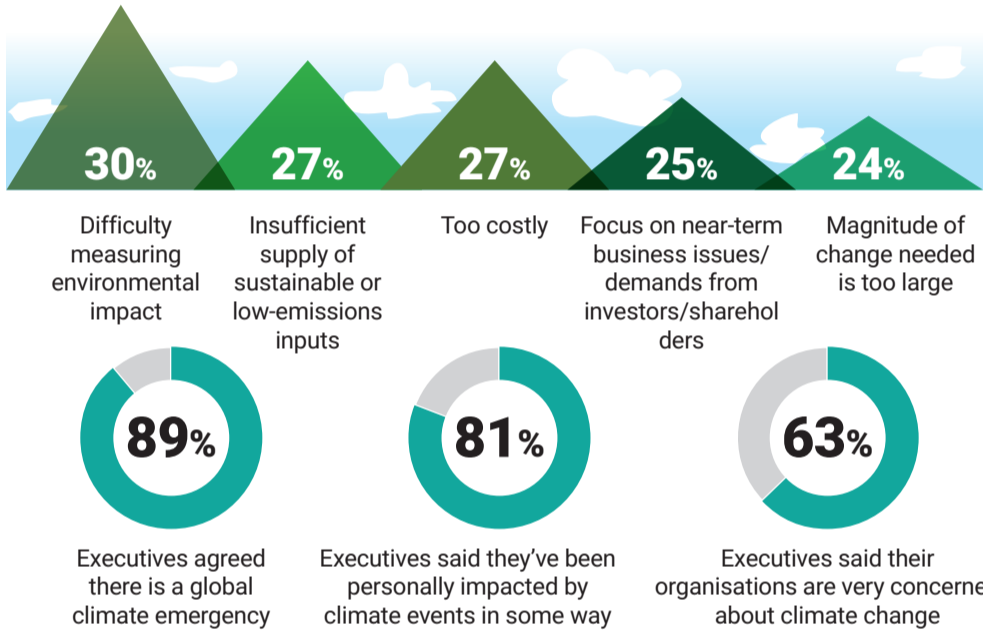

More than half adopted energy-efficient or climate-friendly machinery, technologies, and equipment.

A majority are intentionally reducing air travel trips.

To what degree do you expect climate change to impact your company's strategies and operations over the next three years?

Top five obstacles to driving sustainability efforts

Top five climate issues impacting companies

Which of the following actions/adaptations has your company undertaken as part of its sustainability efforts?

Top actions taken

Harder-to-implement, needle-moving actions

I strongly agree my company's current sustainability efforts have/will have a positive impact on the following

Top five benefits selected

Bottom five benefits selected

Source: Deloitte

TheStar graphics